

PLAN GREATER NAVY YARD

Government to Spend $10,000,
000 in Many Improvements.

The information contained in a Washington dispatch to the Tribune that Secretary of War had adopted the recommendations of Naval Constructor W. G. Groesbeck and Civil Engineer F. R. Harris looking to the enlargement of the navy yard in Brooklyn was received yesterday by officers at the yard with much gratification.

The plans provide for the government acquiring by condemnation proceedings the triangular plot bounded by the present yard wall and Hudson Avenue and the East Street, coming to a point where the yard wall meets the street and Hudson Avenue, and covering about six city blocks. This will give a much needed extension of territory and permit the carrying out of projected improvements, including the construction of three or more docks large enough to take in vessels much heavier than any now planned.

It is further proposed to remove what is left of the old dock and make the whole yard practically an inclosed basin, with piers and slips long enough and wide enough to accommodate big ships and keep them out of the range of tidal influences.

Ever since the Navy Department allowed the land on which the Wallabout Market extension now stands to revert to the City of Brooklyn in the early '90s, there have been occasional efforts to get through what has been termed the Little Street extension of the yard, and the pressure for this has constantly grown more intense. Rear Admiral Frederick Rodgers, then commandant of the station, developed a plan which provided for a considerable development of the waterfront of the yard. Civil Engineers Asserson, Menocal, Gillard, Gregory and others had ideas as to how the yard might be benefited, but the possibility of establishing the yard somewhere else in the neighborhood of New York and selling the present site offset the plan of improvement. The facts that the necessary land anywhere within reach of the city would cost an almost prohibitive sum and that the need for new room has become imperative have led to the favorable consideration of the Goeckel-Harris plan, which, while involving the expenditure of approximately $300,000, will spread the sum over a number of years and make the yard the first in size and facilities, as it is the first in importance, in the country.
